

ABSTRACT

Methods according to prior art for producing three-dimensional moulded bodies generally require outer moulds which define the geometry of a component to be produced. The inventive method for producing three-dimensional moulded bodies renders one such mould redundant. The geometry of a component to be produced is defined by a pre-determined laser guidance or by the geometry of the partial quantities used.